THE LAST MAN.

The light was well spent, and darkness was near, when the enemy's attacks ceased on that part of the Federal line at Chickamauga which was held by the troops under Thomas, on the second day. Between the left of these forces and that remainder of the army which had not left the feld law. the field lay a long stretch of forest, effec-tually cutting off the view between the two points. Just at dusk there was borne this forest a sound of rapid musketry, but this was soon over, and then followed prolonged cheering. It was clear to those with Thomas that the cheers came from Confederates, and signified a capture of more or less importance. The incident served, in connection with what followed, to cast a deeper gloom over the withdraw from the field in retreat to Chattanooga. The left of Thomas' line rested upon a ridge, the end of which was covered with standing corn. At the foot of the ridge, to the left, was a fence, and beyond this the forest already mentioned. A line of Federal skirmishers was posted along the fence, and the orders was posted along the lence, and the orders were for this line to remain until the troops were well off the ridge in their re-treat, and then to quietly withdraw and make the best of their way to rejoin the column. The skirmish line was composed of a single regiment, and a captain was in command, all the field officers having fallen in the two days' fighting. The cap-tain, a straight and soldierly fellow, with bright brown hair and beard closely cut, was waiting with what patience he could command until his time came to retreat. It was an uncertain service at best, this staying behind in skirmish line while the army murched away. So thought the captain, evidently, as he moved uneasily a few paces back and forth behind his men. There was something else to trouble him; he winced whenever he put his left foot to the ground.

The captain had been waiting nearly half an hour when there came an ominous sound from the forest in front. It was too dark to see, but there could be no mis-taking that sound. It was the tramp of men coming cautiously on, as a force would do in the dark, expecting to meet an enemy at every step. The captain thought it yet too early to retire, and so there was nothing for it but to await the ning force and trust to fortune. On ti came, and presently the dusky forms of a line of skirmishers were seen scarcely thirty paces in front of the Federal line. At the same instant the captain's men, standing silently in their places, were dis-covered by the others. Neither knew certainly to which army the other be-longed. The line which came from the wood halted without command, hesitati Then an officer stepped forward and de

"What troops are those?" Not at a loss for a moment, the Federal captain responded:
"All right! We're going up the hill.

Be ready to support us. Now, then, men—quietly! Pass the word along!"
Whatever the doubts of the other, the captain was sure that the force confronting him was Confederate. He was at last relieved of uncertainty—he must move now. His men understood; the mmand went from man to man in low nes, and the whole line of skirmishers quietly turned and marched up through the corn to the top of the ridge. As they came to the open ground at the summit all was still about and in front of them. Their comrades were out of hearing in their retreat. The captain mounted his while the captain was on foot with his skirmishers—and put his little regiment in motion to follow the army. He him-self remained until the last of his men had filed by, and then followed. As he did this, he turned his face as if for a last look at the bloody field. There was nothing there now but darkness and silence. Perfect silence, it seemed, thinking of what had been there less than two hours before. It was perfect silence, save that 200 yards down the ridge to the front, re the enemy's dead and woun thickest, a sharp cry came up out of the night now and then, as the hospital corps lifted a sufferer too roughly or turned some poor fellow over upon a mangled limb. Save, also, that a rustling noise in the corn through which he had just come told the captain that the enemy's skirmishers left at the fence below were already moving on his track.

"The last man at Chickamauga!" muttered the captain as he rode on after his regiment.

They passed briskly down the rearward lope into the deeper shadow of the valley, and presently turning their heads to look behind, saw faintly outlined against the sky the figure of the southern skirmishers one after another they emerged from the corn and stood upon the crest.

The last of Chickamauga! Ah, no!
Not the last; for as the little rear guard ched the lower ground they came upon their wounded comrades, who, too badly hurt to go on to the rear, had yet with untold agony dragged themselves back from the fire swept ground in front, and so got partial shelter. Along the route these wretched sufferers lay thickly. one with an arm half torn off; there a foot dangling; here a poor fellow shot through the body, his death a question not of hours, but of minutes; and so on, in sickening continuance. And all wanting water! There had been none all day, the retreating soldiers were marching with lips and tongues blackened and swollen and cracked with thirst, until many could utter no articulate so

Boys, you won't go and leave us "For God's sake, water! water!"
"Boys, are you on the retreat, and leaving us behind?"

"You ought to hold the ground, boys, till they took care of us!"

"Water! water! Don't let us die here!" Pitiful, pitiful appeals! And all in ain. Not a canteen of water in the whole command. Not an ambulance within miles. Nothing but a victorious foe behind, an unknown way in front, and the blackness of night over all! Pitiful, pitiful! Harder to face—these reproaches—than all of Bragg's artillery.

Ah! here is punishment! Not only to leave the field to the enemy, but to abandon torn and bleeding brothers also!

So thought the captain ridius is more thought the captain, riding in rear of his little worn command. Presently he heard a well known voice at the road-aide, and pulled up his horse.

"Good heavens, major! You here, and hurt!" cried the captain, as he came close to a prostrate figure at the roadside.

"Yes, Milney, I'm here. For God's sake get me a drink of water!" replied the sufferer. And then went on eagerly:
"Is it a retreat, captain? Have we lost it all? Where are the ambulances and the hospital trains? Are all these poor fellove to be left to the enemy? Why, they cau't take care of their own in this wilderness, let alone ours! It is cruel-it is horrible! Get me a drink, captain; get me a drink! That is all I shall ever want. I shall not get away from here."

Capt. Milney dismounted. He had a few precious drops of water in his canteen—hoarded for hours against his own thirst. His friend, Maj. Galton, he found was shot in the breast-how badly could not be told. He was quickly relieved so far as half a dozen swallows of the life ar as hair a dozen swallows of the life giving water could do it.

"God bless you, Milney!" he cried.

"You've done me the last service I shall receive in life. God bless you, my friend! And now go on. You can't help these poor fellows here, I know; you can't help me any further. Go on with your regiment and lesser he But here Milney. ment and leave us. But here, Milney, take this letter, and when you are back in and tell her that her promise made a man of me when I was nigh desperation and despair. Tell her, I say God bless her for it." God's Ohio country give it to Mina Clark,

"Mina Clark!" exclaimed Capt. Milney, starting back. "Mina Clark! Is there no mistake? I thought it was"— "No—no—Mina Clark. I can't tell you now, Milney. I'm growing weak. Good-by, Milney—goodby!" If any inward trouble showed itself in the captain's face none could see it in the m. He was silent but an instant, and then said slowly and firmly, but in a greatly altered voice:

"Maj. Galton, I'm going to put you on my horse and forward you to Chattanooga. You shall be your own messenger to Mina Clark. You have something to live for, and you will live! While I-it does not matter.

Had the major known that Capt. Milney was himself wounded—a painful hurt in the foot, not dangerous, but disabling —his protests might have been vigorous, but they would not have swerved the captain. As it was, the unexpected turn seemed to give the major a new lease of life. In an instant he had resolved to live -he who a moment before had bidden his friend goodby forever. Astride the captain's horse he seemed to get yet other lease of life, and all this stood him in good stead. The troops, tired and dispirited as they were, moved rapidly on the road, and the major's horse kept pace with them. Long before the night was gone Maj. Galton was safe in an ambunot a thought of anything but rest and aleep.

And Capt. Milney? Why, the captain fared badly. He had already been too much about on his injured foot, and it was swollen and stiff. He started to hobble long after his men, but it went so hard that in half an hour he gave it up and lay down by the roadside, a mile or two bethe rearmost of the retreating soldiers. It seemed almost as if Mai Galton's new life and spirit had been ab stracted from the captain's store, leaving the latter ambitionless and despairing.

"I am whipped!" he said to himself, as he lay down and gave up to weariness and pain. "I am whipped; but not by the enemy back there. No; a woman did it!" At daylight next morning Capt. Milney was a wounded prisoner of war, bound for some southern military prison. "I am whipped," he said, as on the night before, and prepared as well as he could to take philosophically. Seven or eight months afterward the captain awoke one morning from the de-lirium of a long fever. He was in a hospital near Washington. When he first secame conscious things about him looked almost as strange as the fantastic visions of that dream haunted fever land from which he had just emerged. All things strange, except—ah! except the female figure at the side of his cot. That was familiar enough; it was Mina Clark. She was reading, and he had been looking at her and wondering dreamily for some time before she turned her head and saw that he was awake. Then he asked the question that was uppermost in his mind. "Where is Major-Maj. Galton?" he asked. "Oh, Charley!" she cried, glad tears streaming from her eyes. "You are con-scious again, thank God! You will get well, dear! But the dreadful things you have been saying while out of your head. The major is here, and comes in every day to see you. But you must not talk now, and I must not talk to you. You are to take a good sip of this and then go to sleep. Not a word now—only, Charley, if anything is in your head about Maj. Galton and—and I—such as you've been talking about in your fever, it's all a mistake, Charley—a cruel, cruel mistake!" Well, he found that out in the afternoon of the same day when he saw Maj. Galton and his wife—his wife, who was not Mina Clark. He discovered that Mina's prom-ise to the major—that promise which had so exalted the major and so wrecked the captain—was simply a promise to set things right with Galton's lady love, who in his absence was being influenced by an unworthy rival. Doing this service in-volved for Mina the sacrifice of some maiden pride and reserve, but at the ma-jor's urgent petition she did it, and even raised him to the seventh heaven of happy anticipation by writing him her promis to deliver his girl safe into his arms whenever he came home.

The captain came to think that he had jumped at a conclusion too quickly, and that a little faith in the girl whose solemn troth he had would have saved him a trip to Libby prison and saved him also the fever which attacked him the very day his ex-change was effected. But then where the major have been if the Last Man at Chickamauga had not lent him a mercial Gazette.
